

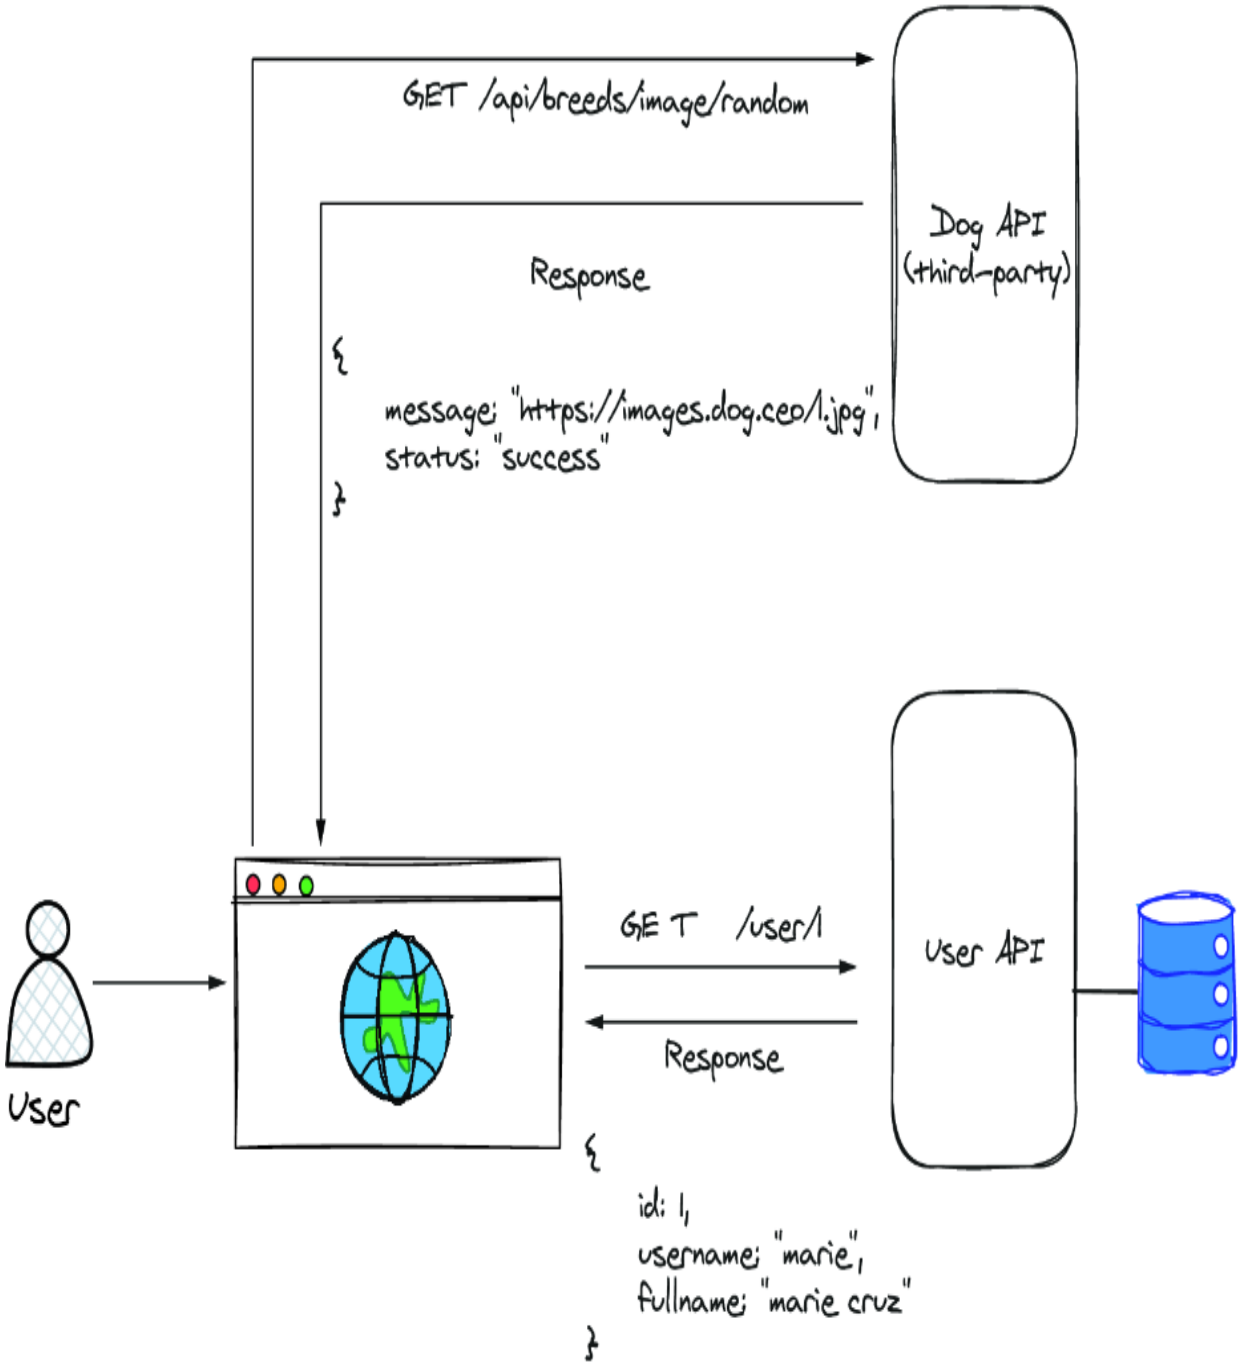

Figure 11.1 An interaction between a web consumer and User API, who are both internal teams. The web consumer also gets data from a third-party API.

Another example, but from a data provider perspective, is that you might have a public API that doesn't know who its consumers are. In this scenario, it makes more sense for the public API to drive the requirements and force the consumers to propagate API changes rather than the other way around.